English National Ballet BALLET FUTURES: The Pipeline Project

Plans for English National Ballet's new pipeline project, Ballet Futures, are announced today.

The high-quality, early-stage, ballet training programme for children aged 8-12 years will proactively encourage and incentivise more dancers from traditionally underrepresented groups (African Diaspora, Caribbean, South Asian and South East Asian heritage) to participate in professional ballet training at the earliest possible point.

Starting with a pilot phase from January 2022 and run in association with dance schools nationwide, which so far includes Dupont Dance Stage School in Leicester, Janet Lomas School of Dancing in Greater Manchester, and West London School of Dance*, the project aims to contribute to and promote a diverse classical landscape, in turn, impacting on 21st century work.

English National Ballet's senior leadership team will work with members of the Company's artistic staff as well as Company dancer, Sarah Kundi, who will help shape the programme and be a mentor to the children involved in the project.

Tamara Rojo CBE, English National Ballet's Artistic Director said: "I believe there are spaces to be filled in the dance training system for young artists who are representative of the world we live in, the stories we want to tell, and the people who tell them. Through Ballet Futures, we will work collaboratively with dance schools to diversify their student base; encouraging talented young dancers from a range of backgrounds and creating an opportunity for them to grow into their potential as artists."

"It's an important step towards broadening access to ballet and I am delighted that, together with these schools, we are providing space for more young dancers to increase their natural aptitude, harness their confidence, understand their artistic personality, and helping them find their places in the dance world in the future."

Sarah Kundi, English National Ballet First Artist and member of the Ballet Futures Leadership Team said: “It is imperative that we enable and support the underrepresented youth of today by providing training and opportunities, combined with being holistically nurtured, enabling them to flourish and fly.”

Shevelle Dynott, former English National Ballet Artist of the Company and facilitator on the Ballet Futures programme: “We all know representation has a huge effect especially on the younger minds. We have a duty to make them aware they are capable of anything they put their mind to, with support and encouragement of the elders around them.”

Following an audition, participants in Ballet Futures will receive free weekly training at their local dance school with additional financial support to contribute to the costs of shoes, school uniform and travel to and from English National Ballet’s east London home, the Mulryan Centre for Dance, where backstage access will be offered. Participants will also have the chance to work with English National Ballet artists and teachers including a Company representative who will visit participating schools twice a year to offer class, host a Q&A and share feedback and support.

Ballet Futures: The Pipeline Project is supported by the Leverhulme Trust.

*Other dance schools who are interested in taking part in the project are asked to contact the Ballet Futures team at balletfutures@ballet.org.uk for further information.
